

PURPOSIVE COMMUNICATION

GROUP 1: ARCHITECTURAL DRAFTING

2-A

Angeles, Allison Lee M. & Rose Jane Alcantara

DEPRESSION AMONG STUDENTS

CIRCLE A – CONTEXT

Nowadays, many students are dealing with different struggles in their personal lives, especially problems at home, financial difficulties, family conflicts, academic pressure, and problems with relationships or friendships. Because of these challenges, some students may feel emotionally tired and overwhelmed. However, they do not always tell other people what they are going through. Sometimes, they choose to keep their problems to themselves and continue going to school while pretending that everything is okay.

CIRCLE B – CONTENT

The topic focuses on "depression among students" and how it can affect their daily lives, studies, relationships, and behavior. Some students may still laugh, talk with their friends, participate in class, and post happy moments on social media even when they are struggling inside. For some, school can even become the place where they feel happier or more comfortable because they can temporarily forget the problems they have at home. It also discusses how pressure from school, family expectations, and personal problems can affect a student's emotional and mental well-being.

CIRCLE C – MEANING

For students, depression is not simply about being sad or having a bad day. It can represent the silent struggles that many young people carry while trying to continue with their everyday lives. A student may look completely fine on the outside but may already be struggling emotionally. This reminds us that we should not easily judge someone based on how they look or act. Sometimes, a simple "Are you okay?", listening without judging, or simply being there for someone can mean a lot to a person who is silently struggling.

Why is this topic interesting to us?

This topic is interesting to us because it is something that many students can relate to, even if they do not openly talk about it. As students, we all have our own problems, but not everyone is comfortable sharing them. Some students come to school carrying problems from their homes, yet they still try to smile, laugh, and act normally in front of their classmates. Minsan, school becomes the place where they feel safe and happy, even for a few hours, because it helps them forget what they are going through at home. What makes this topic more interesting is that we cannot always tell who is struggling just by looking at them. The student who is always smiling might be dealing with something we know nothing about. The quiet student might be fighting a personal battle. And even the student who always seems happy may have moments when they feel tired and alone. This topic teaches us that everyone has a story that we may not see. As students, we believe that talking about depression is important because we should learn to understand each other instead of immediately judging each other. We may not be able to solve someone's problems, but we can choose to listen, understand, and show kindness. In the end, this topic is not only about depression—it is also about students, their hidden struggles, and the importance of making someone feel that they are not alone. Sometimes, a little understanding from a classmate, friend, or teacher can make a student feel that there is still someone who cares.

